

DESIGNS ART PALACE TO FLOAT IN THE BAY

Sculptor Robert Paine Suggests a Great Civic Centre on the Water.

CONTENDS IT IS FEASIBLE

Would Anchor It Off Battery,
but Tugs Could Pull It
About at Will.

Robert Paine, a sculptor with a studio on the Mountain road, West Hoboken, has designed plans for a floating civic arts building, which he suggests, shall be anchored off the Battery, containing a school of art and the crafts, a museum, a library, a theatre, and a great civic theatre for concerts and high class plays at popular prices, or for "open house" discussions of matters of vital importance to a city of people.

The plans and a model will be placed on view at the Architectural League's exhibition, which will be opened at 125 West Fifty-seventh street on Feb. 2.

Mr. Paine said yesterday that there is nothing visionary about his scheme, as engineers have assured him that the construction of his remarkable building is perfectly feasible. The only obstacles in the way of the floating structure are the wherewithal to build it, permission from the city and the consent of the War Department to tie it to the Battery wall.

For several years art societies and individuals have discussed the project of bringing about the erection of a civic arts building.

Sculptor Paine contends that one of the most desirable features of his plan lies in the cheapness of his water site. "And if the city should be inclined to build this thing," Mr. Paine said yesterday, "the amount involved would be very slight compared to the returns that the city and the people would get."

"The city of New York," he continued, "has thoroughly and completely ignored the advantages and conduct of art. It is the richest city in the world and she has done less for art than any other city in the country. Her standards have all been money. The measure of the average New Yorker's success is based upon the amount of money he has made."

"I insist that art is the only full language of a civilized people. People cannot be far advanced in civilization who do not cultivate the fine arts. A nation that doesn't is a nation of bores. The most dignified thing on earth is the welfare and progress of a people."

"It is my idea that New York should have a civic arts building for the enjoyment of the people in all that will tend to make them better men and women. It should contain first a civic theatre."

"In the galleries there can be paintings, and room for plans and models submitted in competition for public buildings, statues, &c., where the public can view them and judge for themselves as to their merits. Art that does not come from the people is not worth anything."

"The theatre, however, with its opportunities for music and the drama at the very lowest popular prices, is the great thing in my scheme. According to my designs the theatre will have a seating capacity of 8,000 people."

Mr. Paine's plans for a civic arts building call for a structure of the earlier Greek style of architecture, of concrete with steel frame, with supports springing from a floating foundation. The buoyant concrete foundation contains numerous watertight compartments, as aboard steamships. The building is circular, with a portion running entirely around it inside the graceful Doric columns. The great theatre which the plans divide into a large and a smaller auditorium by the placing of a partition across part of the stage, is bowl shaped. On the plans you walk into the theatre at the horizon of the bowl.

A Sun reporter who looked at a picture of the model asked Mr. Paine if he was sure that the building wouldn't sink.

"Why, bless your heart," he replied, "engineers who have studied my design tell me it is most admirably and perfectly feasible. One of them said that the only thing that bothered him was that somebody did not have the same idea as mine."

"The galleries and rooms for a school of art and of the crafts are in the upper plan spaces."

Mr. Paine said that if such a structure could be anchored off the Battery and it was deemed advisable to move it to some other section of the harbor all that would be necessary would be to charter a few tugs, make fast to the structure and tow it to its destination.

On the outside of the portion on the plans for the buoyant foundation would be considerable space, Mr. Paine pointed out, that could be used as exercise tracks for athletic sports.

"What a fine scheme it would be," he said, "to have foot races around the buildings."

Mr. Paine has patents pending, securing his rights in his unique plan for his floating palace for the education of the people in matters of art.

NEW THOUGHT EXPOUNDED.

Mrs. Elizabeth Towne Says It's the Thought of the Ages Barbed.

At the Forty-eighth Street Theatre, where for six nights out of the seven Willie Collier performs, Mrs. Elizabeth Towne expounded principles of New Thought last night to a large audience. Mrs. Towne is the head of the New Thought movement in America and is the author of the Naturalist Magazine, the official publication of the cult.

Edward Markham in introducing Mrs. Towne said that New Thought really is new at all. Plato, one of the earliest of our deep thinkers, thought along these very lines, but it has not been until recent years that the principles of New Thought have been crystallized into a definite movement.

Mrs. Towne began her talk by explaining how difficult it is to find a satisfactory definition for New Thought. "It is so very many things," she said, "it is the protest of the soul against special privileges of religion as predestination and infant damnation. It is the thought of the ages barbed. It is religion made practical for it takes the laws of life and codifies and simplifies them for our immediate use. Or, in other words, it correlates the wisdom of now at Plato, one of the earliest of our deep thinkers, thought along these very lines, but it has not been until recent years that the principles of New Thought have been crystallized into a definite movement."

Mrs. Towne said that New Thought is an essential attribute of the theory of new thought. She advised her hearers to cultivate peace, because, she said, we never know when we are to hear the summons from within, and when we do hear we must be in a position to act instantly. "There is not a thought which goes out of your mind," she said, "but it is the universe. All nature is one and you and I are the body of it."

"Of belief," concluded Mrs. Towne, "that some day we shall be able to understand as well as in soul. It may take a hundred or even a thousand years for such a condition to come to pass, but it is bound to come. The reason I believe we shall live forever physically is because some will and every want is a certain promise of ultimate fulfillment. We die only because we get tired. But before we become death we must have a new body, and that is our present social and political system."

After the talk Mrs. Towne held an informal reception on the stage.

THE PALM BEACH SEASON.

All Tables Filled at Opening of Poincella's Garden Grill.

Palm Beach, Jan. 26.—At the opening tonight of the garden grill of the Poincella, a number of smart dinner parties and later a cabaret show kept the tables filled until midnight.

Peck, were dinner hosts. Mr. Peck had a stag party in which were Gerard Bonnet, H. C. Leeds and H. P. Glen. Mr. and Mrs. Lytle Fox of New York gave a dinner, entertaining Mr. and Mrs. David Boies.

The bathing crowd on the beach this morning missed the athletic exhibitions that A. J. Drexel Biddle and Mrs. Biddle have been giving frequently. The Philadelphia society man and his wife were here getting in training, and was called back on business by a wire last night. Mr. Biddle will give a number of private boxing matches at his Philadelphia home for society the latter part of February, when he and Jack O'Brien are to put on the gloves again.

Mr. and Mrs. Biddle were in the habit of running two miles down the beach each morning. After they had donned their bathing suits to the Wigwam, the winter home of Richard Croker, Mr. Biddle would drive a broom handle two feet into the sand and pull it with his teeth, and he and his wife did a number of exhibition tumbling stunts in the sand each day, to the immense entertainment of society here.

DOCTORS HERE LIKE TRAVEL STUDY PLAN

New York Physicians Have Part
In New Scheme to Advance
Their Profession.

Medical men of this city are interested in the plans of the American Society for Physicians' Study Travels, an organization formed in Philadelphia on Saturday night. Dr. Theodore C. Janeway, Dr. Lansky R. Williams and Dr. Richard Kovacs are among the New York physicians represented in the society.

It is the first medical organization of its kind in this country. It is based upon similar organizations encouraged by members of the profession abroad and most particularly in Germany. The society is modeled along the lines of the German Central Committee for Medical Study, travel members of which recently visited this country and imbued our physicians with the idea of forming such an association here.

The main purpose of the society is to encourage physicians to study the latest developments in science at the hands of foreign medical men. It is planned to send groups of members abroad upon occasions of special interest to physicians, or when some work is being done by foreigners where investigation would be helpful to the progress of American medicine. Hygiene and economic and social problems related to medicine will be studied.

A number of physicians, for example, are planning to go to London to attend the International Medical Congress that meets from August 6 to August 13 next summer. Their trip, it is now expected, will be made under the auspices of the new society. They will thus have an official standing at the conference and the reports of proceedings there published by the society will benefit the profession as a whole. They are planning to sail on the Bremen on July 3.

In our own country there has been no especial effort made by doctors to investigate our watering places, and they will be included in the trips taken by the society members. The founders of the society will invite cities and corporations and health resorts to send their representatives as associate members of the association.

The trips will be in charge of the officers of the club. As soon as the association is chartered it is planned to have four presidents elected, so that there will be one in the country all the while.

At the formation of the society Saturday night in the University Club, attended by practically every noted physician in Philadelphia and by doctors from other cities, Dr. J. M. Enders of Philadelphia was made president, and Dr. Albert Bernheim secretary. An executive committee of twenty-five, upon which are the New York physicians mentioned, was appointed at Saturday's meeting.

Now He Can't Empty Both Shells to Keep Curiosity.

NEW LONDON, Conn., Jan. 26.—Clarence Ringham of Quaker Hill was surprised yesterday to find an egg the size of a baseball and only slightly elongated in shape in one of the nests at his place.

Ringham promptly thought to blow the egg and preserve the shell. When the big shell had been emptied of liquid something rattled inside. By holding the shell against a strong light it was found that an egg of ordinary size was inside.

SUNDAY CONCERTS HAVE MUCH VARIETY

Bach and Debussy Join Hands on the Symphony Society's Interesting Programme.

PHILHARMONIC MATINEE

Russian Songs and Chamber Music Are Other Features of the Day.

After a silence of a short period the Symphony Society's orchestra took up again its winter song at Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme arranged by Walter Damrosch for this concert was not at all conventional. It consisted of a medley of extremes. The first part was devoted to music by Sebastian Bach and the second to compositions by Claude Achille Debussy. The ancient days was represented by three numbers, his concerto in F for orchestra with violin and flute obligato, his suite in B minor for flute and orchestra, and his D minor piano concerto.

The performers of the obligato in the orchestral concerto were Alexander Sashaysky, concert master of the orchestra, and Bruno Labate, first oboe, Georges Barrere, the solo flutist, was heard in the suite, and Ernesto Consolo, pianist, was the principal in the piano concerto. It was altogether a delightful first part, for the Bach music was on the whole excellently played. The orchestral delivery in the F major concerto was not entirely free from roughness, but in the second movement at least it was admirable.

Mr. Barrere's playing of the suite was something to bring joy to every listener. The exquisite modulation of dynamics and the perfection of rhythmic effects achieved by the much admired virtuoso commanded the warmest approval and received prolonged applause. In this suite, as in the succeeding concerto, there was faultless unanimity between orchestra and soloist.

Mr. Consolo is well known as a pianist of fine scholarship, adequate technique and rare musical insight. He has put to his credit many excellent interpretations, but he has imprinted on the memory nothing which outshines his admirable performance of yesterday.

The second movement in particular was inspiring in its brilliant style, its rhythmic incisiveness and its communicative spirit. The Debussy numbers on the list were the familiar "L'Après-Midi d'un Faune," two flute solos, the "Marche Nuptiale."

The Philharmonic Society gave a programme of music taken entirely from composers of the romantic school at its afternoon concert yesterday at Carnegie Hall. The numbers presented were all familiar, but this fact seemed only to add to the pleasure of the large audience present, which gave frequent demonstrations of its approval.

The soloist was Mme. Marie Rappold, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and the graceful ballet music from Rubinstein's opera "The Firebird" were the orchestral forerunners to Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony, which served as the last number.

Between these came the vocal numbers. First Mme. Rappold was heard in the aria "Ave Maria" from Bruch's cantata "The Cross of Fire" and later in "Elsa's Dream" from Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the aria "Deer Hunt of Song" from "Tannhauser." Her singing of the Bruch music brought her much applause in spite of the fact that she did not sing it as well as the Wagner excerpts. In these her voice was often staid and seemed very well adapted to passages calling for a pure sustained note. But when power and intensity of dramatic climax were needed she did not seem always fully to fathom the words of her text. This lack was also felt in the Bruch aria.

Dvorak's symphony with its themes suggesting negro melodies, had been played recently in commemoration of the Emancipation Proclamation. Yesterday Mr. Strinsky led his men through a good performance of the work. Their playing in the lighter numbers of the programme would have been more enjoyable if touched with more buoyancy of spirit.

Not the least service performed by Constance Purdy in giving a recital of songs yesterday afternoon was her disclosure of the Little Theatre as an ideal place for such entertainments. The intimate charm of the audience chamber and the suitability of its acoustics united in furnishing the singer with exceptional conditions. Miss Purdy, who showed herself to be a singer possessed of a pleasing, if not warmly tinted voice, and taste, if not technique, sang some interesting and not hackneyed songs by Borodine, Dargomizsky, Glazounov, Rimsky-Korsakov and Moussorgsky.

The Zellinger Quartet entertained a considerable company of friends in the evening at Aeolian Hall. This organization consists of Antonietti Zellinger, first violin; Amundus Zellinger, second violin; Joseph Zellinger, Jr., viola; and Joseph Zellinger, Jr., cello. The programme offered by this musical family comprised Mendelssohn's quartet in E flat major, opus 44, Debussy's in G minor, opus 15, No. 4.

It can be said of the Zellingers that their play with intonation generally accurate and with an unanimity which shows the effects of constant association in musical thought and frequent rehearsal. That the quartet has much to offer beyond smoothness and correctness of performance may perhaps be ascertained, but much chamber music is performed without even these merits.
